WEEKLY FOCUS – A New Year Resolution: Developing a Wealth Mindset

So, the New Year has begun and you've yet to claim a resolution. It's never too late. Why not resolve to strengthen your strategy on wealth building?

Since you're reading this, you're probably already on the path to financial success. But it doesn't hurt to compare your financial habits with those of the already-wealthy. If you haven't adopted these tactics, maybe it's time you should. If you've already embraced them, recommit to them and pass them on to your children or heirs.

A review of the top books on what it takes for financial success reveals some common tactics in those who've achieved it.

Develop a wealth mindset. Those who believe accumulating wealth is a given are those who most often get it. Success must be a given. Bruce Lee once said, "As a man thinks, so he is." Granted, the man was a martial arts phenomenon, not a financial wiz, but the principle remains that same.

Don't be a sheep. If you follow the advice of most people, you'll end up like most people. But – most people aren't wealthy. So why follow their actions or advice? Traditional advice on attaining wealth is based on risk avoidance and fear. But wealthy people are usually described as risk-takers.

Embrace simplicity. Thomas Stanley interviewed hundreds of millionaires for his book, "The Millionaire Next Door." He discovered most of them led frugal, simple lives. Indeed, the typical millionaire lives in a middle-class home and drives a two-year-old or paid-off car, according to Dave Ramsey. Trying to embody the physical trappings of a stereotypical millionaire is expensive and could end up costing you substantially.

Beef up your financial literacy. The more you know about finance and your personal economics, the better equipped you are to make sound wealth-building, retirement and income distribution decisions.

Don't work for your money – make your money work for you. Every penny is a seed, with the potential to grow more. Wise investments accumulate wealth for you, even while you're sleeping.

Call our office today. We can provide you with the financial advice you need to ensure your money is working hard for you – and not the other way around.
